I'm glad that such an important question is being discussed actively during the time like nowadays, when the patriotism is questioned or dismissed at all.

First of all, I was born in Republic of Bashkortostan and have been living here ever since. This is the main reason I find my motherland valuable for me: I am used to it, everything here is familiar and endearing. I support the idea of appreciating the place you were born in. Also I don't have any complaints whatsoever.

Another thing I'd like to mention is that I am deeply amazed by the Bashkir culture. I could listen to the kurai's melody for hours at a time, it's incredibly fascinating. I'm fond of local folklore, all the stories and legends are truly breathtaking. We all must praise, preserve and be proud of our unique culture, that's what differs people from each other worldwide, after all.

The most of all things I love the football club Ufa. For me that's already enough of a reason to value my motherland since it possesses something that makes my life brighter and much more fun.

The national Anthem of Bashkortostan awakens my patriotic feelings, and may it always stay this way no matter where I am.
