As everyone knows, extreme sports are very popular nowadays. Some people actually enjoy and love such an activity, others want to try something new or fight their fear. ~~And~~ ^{Also} all of them consider it really helps to build a character.

To be honest, I think that doing dangerous sports does help to ~~develop~~ ^{improve} some features. For example, it gives such a great opportunity to know more about yourself: the way you think, how if your body strong enough in a how it seems dangerous life situations. Not to mention that after knowing a lot more about your behavior while doing extreme sports, people increase their confident. By the way, you get an information about your weak sides, so you can always make them stronger and ^{more} ~~more~~ efficient. Besides, getting new experience makes lives much more brighter and happier. People get refreshed after doing extreme sports.

But on the other hand there's such a popular opinion that includes normal life without forcing yourself to look in the eyes of a fear.

Although, I think it's always great to know what you would in a dangerous situation.

To sum up, I would like to say that any ^{sort of} experience helps you to get more information about yourself and doing extreme sports is not an exception. So do not miss those opportunities if ~~when~~ they are available almost to ever.
