Some people believe extreme sports have a benefit of helping to build character.

As for me, I think the statement is true. In the first place, extreme sports are difficult mentally and physically. People have to rely on themselves in order to do the sport. It builds their confidence and character. In the second place, any sport is good for reducing the blood pressure and so on. The more we show up, the better we feel about ourselves. That helps us gain confidence and experience, which is important in a long-term success of building up character.

The reason why others think differently is they're afraid. There's a reason why they're anxious. It's dangerous. Some cannot overcome all of that and start thinking there's something wrong with them. It doesn't help with building character at all.

I disagree with that opinion. I think it's too childish to make excuses. I, for one, am sure if you want to do something to get better, you'll do it.

In my opinion, extreme sports are valuable for building character. It's good for us in terms of mental and physical health.
