Historical sites are a big part in the culture of every country. They allow anyone to see the past and learn about the significance of many historical events. But should tourists ~~research~~ do research about historical sites before sightseeing them? There are arguments for both opinions about the question.

~~On the one hand~~ In my opinion, reading about historical sites before sightseeing would improve your knowledge and in result it would be more exciting to see them in person. Not only that, but it would also help tourists understand the impact of the historical site and provide context about its importance in the history of the place they are visiting.

However, the opposing opinion is that tourists don't need to know ~~as~~ much about historical sites before visiting them, since their history can be explained by guides or informational signs, and it could be more fun to learn that way. I don't agree with this opinion because of the fact that there might not always be guides or informational signs at the sites, so it's more reliable to research at home and then go sightseeing with your new knowledge, which I think is more exciting.

In conclusion, I think it's better for tourists to read about historical sites before going to see them in person, because it's convenient and provides much needed context about its history and importance.
