Most people going sightseeing don't really bother reading st about the historical sites they will attend.

In my opinion, it is inefficient. People who go sightseeing without a guide can get lost during their site exploration. Moreover, some places are basically dangerous for visiting.

Also, for those who are attending guided excursions it would be easier to comprehend new information if they already know something about the place.

However, one might find it thrilling to visit a completely new place without any knowledge of it, especially a historical site. Speaking of some people purposefully refuse to get any information about the place ^{to} experience the awe and surprise from witnessing a breathtaking view head-on, which enhances tourist's emotional state.

Of course, it is a valid opinion, considering the fact that some people might never visit the place ever again, but yet again, I think it reduces them the whole point of the sightseeing - to expand one's historical knowledge and broaden one's horizons. So while having no prejudices for the site for the sake of unforgettable memories, it may as well be inconvenient and even dangerous at some point.

Concluding my passage I would like to say that reading about the site is important because by doing that tourists get a full experience and better comprehension in general. This is why, in my opinion, people should do this research of information.
