Writing

History is an unalienable field of study in our lives. It helps us preserve the wisdom of our ancestors, furthermore, learn from their mistakes. Historical possessions are well kept in order to depict how people have lived before. Such are statues, monuments, visual art pieces. But should we understand their meaning?

I ~~think~~ frankly think that one should preliminarily investigate the matter. As people who didn't live in the time the historical treasure was created, we cannot fully understand its ~~meaning~~ actual meaning. To truly acknowledge the significance of the ancient site, one should initially become acquainted with its background.

Conversely, some opt to perceive the site first and only later read up. It's possible reason for that could be the will to appreciate the site as it is. Or perhaps some individuals want to try to sense, to indulge in their own feelings concerning the place, monument, or piece of art.

However, I still want to stick to my point of view because I know some historical sites that look like nothing special. But the battles that took place, the heroes who perished there are verily legendary. Ith conclusion, my thoughts on this topic shall remain unchanged. Most historical monuments are probably standing so that we could express our gratitude for those who fought us up. Additionally, it's crucial to understand the author's feelings when admiring art. There is always more than meets the eye.
